Choosing a Crested Gecko

When choosing a crested gecko as a pet, there are a few things to keep in mind. First, you'll need to decide what type of crested gecko you want. There are three main types of crested geckos: red, yellow, and orange. Red crested geckos are the most common, but yellow and orange crested geckos are also available. The great thing about crested geckos is there are many subcategories within these three main types. There are hundreds of different morphs, each with unique color and pattern variations. With so many different options, you will be able to find a gecko that is perfect for you. These different morphs however can greatly vary in price.

Once you've decided on the type of crested gecko you want, you'll need to find a reputable breeder. You can find crested gecko breeders online or at reptile shows. When choosing a breeder, it's important to ask about the health and genetics of the geckos. You should also ask to see the parents of the gecko you're interested in.

When you bring your new crested gecko home, you'll need to set up a habitat for it. The habitat should be a minimum of 10 gallons. The habitat should also have a heat lamp and a UVB light. You'll also need to provide your gecko with a hiding place, a water bowl, and a food dish.

Feeding a Crested Gecko

Crested geckos are omnivores, which means they eat both plants and animals. In the wild, crested geckos eat a variety of insects, fruits, and flowers. In captivity, crested geckos can be fed a diet of crickets, mealworms, and dubia roaches. You can also feed your crested gecko a variety of fruits, such as bananas, strawberries, and blueberries. It is imperative to supplement your gecko's diet with calcium and vitamin D3 to ensure they are getting all of the nutrients they need.

Breeding Crested Geckos

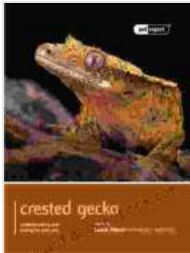

Crested geckos can be bred in captivity. However, it is important to do your research before attempting to breed crested geckos. You should also make sure that you have the proper equipment and knowledge to care for the baby geckos.

If you're thinking about breeding crested geckos, the first thing you'll need to do is find a mate for your gecko. You can find crested gecko breeders online or at reptile shows. When choosing a mate for your gecko, it's important to choose a healthy gecko that is not closely related to your own gecko.

Once you've found a mate for your gecko, you'll need to set up a breeding habitat. The breeding habitat should be a minimum of 20 gallons. The habitat should also have a heat lamp, a UVB light, and a variety of hiding places. You'll also need to provide your geckos with a water bowl and a food dish.

Crested geckos lay eggs. The eggs are typically laid in a humid environment. The eggs will hatch after about 60 days. The baby geckos will be very small and will need to be cared for carefully.

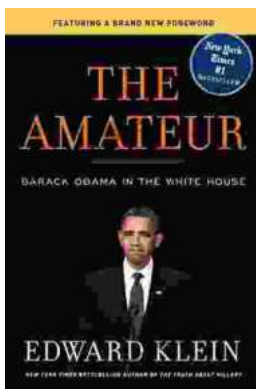

Crested geckos are beautiful, easy to care for, and have unique personalities. If you're thinking about getting a crested gecko as a pet, this guide has everything you need to know to get started. With proper care, crested geckos can live for up to 15 years.
